

Need for recognition

Politics often feels like walking in mountain fields covered by thick fog. The direction is determined based on a very small insight into the path, it will be advantageous to follow.

Yes, if it is completely wrong, we can also be unsure of where the target is located. Perhaps we even disagree on what and where the goal is?

But the worst uncertainty is created when there is no common recognition that we need to move away from the present set-up. Perhaps a false understanding of the present state of things?

This situation may be even extremely dangerous, if we mix a false pride into our decision-making processes, where we alone know and do not feel that we need outside help.

This often happens if we as decision-makers do not have the necessary knowledge and tools necessary to measure and evaluate whether we come forward from our current situation or not.

For many politicians their career are a perpetual wandering in the dense fog, accompanied by a proud, personal understanding that it must be the landscape which is changing, now they never reach their goal.
