

Summer in South Greenland

In August the Arctic summer culminates. The nature has got through the major challenges of the summer. In the late evening and in the night we hear the distinctive, beautiful cry of the great northern diver. It seems like the bird wants to tell us that he also this summer has become the proud father of a brood of chickens ready to fly.

The fields of the sheep farmers in South Greenland appears Verdigris green, and hopefully, this year the harvest will cover enough hay for feeding the ewes throughout the winter.

As a perpetual motion machine that knows no concept of time, the glaciers of the ice sheet remain to spit out large and small pieces of ice into the fjords.

The lakes and the rivers are full of trout, although the local people have been there with their fishing nets and their fishing rods.

A lot of people visit the fell-fields in August. It is time for berry-picking. The blueberries and the crowberries are assembled for the cake baking in the winter.

It is summer in South Greenland.

South Greenland,
August 2016

The summer in South Greenland